Aaron rogers news bleacher report

Brett Duke/Associated PressGreen Bay Packers quarterback Aaron Rodgers never actually went anywhere, but he's clearly back after his status as the game's most gifted passer came into the issue over the past three seasons. During Sunday's 37-30 victory over the New Orleans Saints at the Mercedes-Benz Superdome, Rodgers pulled out all his old tricks, easily outdueled Drew Brees and helped Green Bay stake their claim as the NFC's best with three weeks in the game. To be perfectly honest, Rodgers previously butted up against the impossible standard he set with four seasons of 38 or more touchdowns and two MVP between 2011 and '16. His resume, which includes championship and Super Bowl MVP-all but guaranteed future stay in Canton, Ohio. But the quarterback situation became stagnant in Green Bay, with marriage head coach Mike McCarthy ending in divorce and lots of bad blood between the two. The transition from McCarthy to current head coach Matt LaFleur was not seamless despite last season's overall team success. Rodgers clearly needs some time to move from one system to the next. Jeffrey Phelps/Associated PressAs such, others around the league became standard bearers for the position when the Packers quarterback previously held the torch. Kansas City Chiefs Patrick Mahomes and Baltimore Ravens Lamar Jackson became quarterbacks everyone else wanted to emulate. The 36-year-old Rodgers was far from done, even though the Packers decided to draft a quarterback prospect, Jordan Love, with this year's first-round draft pick. Now in LaFleur's second season, Rodgers is once again back doing things that always made him dominant. Their success together is due, in part, to a 16-year veteran doing a little self-exploration, as Rodgers told reporters last week: In this situation, I've just chosen to work for myself. I feel really good about where I'm at. Matt and I have been friendship since the beginning. It's even increased during this offseason. There's a lot of trust. We're in the second year of the system and guys are playing a little faster and we're finding ways to be more effective. It maybe doesn't sell a lot of documents or get a lot of hits on the website, but for me, it's closer to the truth than this idea of some monster chip. Continuity from season to season can not be forgotten. Even someone as good as Rodgers still needs time to adapt to new circumstances. And now he seems to be in a zen-like state. He no longer runs a massive boulder that used to exist on the shoulder after tumbling to a 24th overall pick in the '05 draft. Love's choice this year doesn't ced him too much either. If anything, it's almost the opposite, I'm totally at peace with where I'm with my career, Rodgers said in an interview on The Rich Eisen Show (h/t Kruse USA Today's Packers Wire). And that is what has freed me up to get to this level of comfort at peace, which sometimes goes beyond my understanding. What always separated Rodgers from everyone else was his natural hand talent. Noone before Mahomes truly rivaled the Green Bay gunslinger for supremacy in the field. Sometimes the old rock is a show exactly how he earned such a reputation, and he did with one of the best throws we'll see this season when he rolled to the left and uncorked a stunningly beautiful 48-yard pass to Allen Lazard with a while flick of the hand. NFL @NFLTHIS throw. Rodgers puts it right on Allen Lazard for a 48-yard catch! #GoPackGo 📺: #GBvsNO on NBC 📺: NFL app//Yahoo Sports app: ball placement and touch seen above, especially considering he doesn't even fully fix his feet is special. The two connected with a 72-yard pass later in the contest that showed how Rodgers can still steer the ball down the field with relative ease. But it's not all great play. Rodgers completed 65.6 percent of his passes for 283 yards and three points against a talented Saints defense. Life is easier for Rodgers because LaFleur, who doubles as an offensive play caller, constructed a quarterback-friendly scheme largely dependent on play-action passing attack. The next Gen Stats @NextGenStatsAaron Rodgers and #Packers offense featured play action in heavy attack, using play action for 52% of dropbacks, his highest PA rate in a game over the past five seasons (previous high: 42%). He didn't just take what was available to him. He extended the play, showed a good pocket presence and ensured victory for his team, drawing the Saints defender offside for a decisive 3-and-3 play with 3:49 left to play and Green Bay winning with a field goal. Rodgers' incomparable hard count drew the defender offside, and then the quarterback had a patented shot toward the end zone, where Saints cornerback Janoris Jenkins committed a pass interference, thus giving the Packers an automatic first down at the 1-yard line that led to the game sealing a touchdown toss to tight end Robert Tonyan four games later. Surprisingly, the Packers offensive performance came, although leading goal Davante Adams didn't play because of a tweaked hamstring. Green Bay will only be better with Adams in the lineup. And he's just the starting point. Green Bay's offensive line is still coming together. The unit has already cycled through three different iterations to start the season. Elgton Jenkins moved from left guard to right tackle in Week 1. Veteran Rick Wagner was due to start Week 2 because of an injury to Lane Taylor. Billy Turner returned to the lineup against the Saints, and he finally took the right tackle with Patrick right guard. As this group becomes healthy, it should solidize itself as one of the league's best. Defensively, the Packers play without their rock in the middle. Kenny Clark missed his second straight game after injuring a groin muscle in the season opener against the Minnesota Vikings. As Athletic's Matt Schneiderman noted, Clark practiced this week, but wasn't quite ready to go. The Pro Bowl interior defender would be ready for next Monday's meeting with the Atlanta Falcons. Bruce Kluckhohn/Associated PressSoms (1-2) entered this season as one of the NFC favorites for the Super Bowl. With the victory, the Packers have put themselves level over New Orleans. Right now, Green Bay is the clear favorite to win the NFC North despite the Chicago Bears getting a 3-0 start. How Chicago performs in the coming weeks will depend entirely on what the coaching staff decides to do behind the center after benching Mitchell Trubisky for Nick Foles. Either way, the Bears are at a disadvantage in the game's most important position compared to their senior rival. The Seattle Seahawks (3-0) are the only other NFC team in the Packers class with Russell Wilson leading the way as an early MVP favorite. Even so, the Seahawks secondary has torched so far. Seattle has allowed 1,303 passing yards in the first three weeks of play, which is a new record for futility, according to the NFL on CBS. Rodgers and the Packers looked like a major regression contender after last season's 13-3 campaign, which featured several close victories. Instead, Rodgers and Co. have built on the foundation that a year ago, which makes the quarterback as dangerous as he's been for quite some time. Brent Sobleski covers the NFL for Bleacher Report. Jed Jacobsohn/Associated PressGreen Bay Packers quarterback Aaron Rodgers provided an interesting breakdown of his competitive mindset Tuesday on The Pat McAfee Show: Zach Kruse @zachkruse2 #Packers QB Aaron Rodgers on fear of failure, and redefining the success, from @PatMcAfeeShow: went into more detail, showing how football requires a lot of teamwork to win championships: the 36-year-old has taken his team deep into the playoffs many times, but has only one Super Bowl title in his career. He has many individual honors, including two MVP awards and the best career passer rating in NFL history of 103.1, but he knows it takes more than just him to win. While he clearly does everything it takes to win, Rodgers understands it's unrealistic to expect victory every time. Packers fans might not be happy with the quarterback challenging the famous Vince Lombardi quote, but it's an interesting mindset from the veteran. Jason Behnken/Associated PressHeads was turned titletown back in April when the Green Bay Packers traded up in the first round to select Utah State quarterback Jordan Love. There was speculation that The pack might be going to life without arguably the best quarterback the franchise has ever had. Questions about whether Aaron Rodgers had a downslope in his career seem to have undoubtedly answered over the first month of the season as red-hot Rodgers led the Packers to wins in each of their first four games. They looked like one of the NFL's best teams led by one of the NFL's best signal callers. Headed into the bye, everything was fine. Coming from the bye is another story. The Packers went to Tampa in Week 6 and got flattened 38-10 by the Buccaneers. With the loss, Rodgers was ill like multiple interceptions and completion percentage under 50 badly. And with the game out of reach, he watched the last seven minutes of the fourth quarter from Green Bay's bench. Now some no doubt say it was just one bad game, a fluky exit from which the 36-year-old and Packers quickly rebounded. And that may be true. But after watching them get thoroughly dominated in their biggest test of the season so far, it's also fair to wonder if we overreacted to the quarterback's hot start. Jason Behnken/Associated PressIn justice, it really was a hot start. In the first four games this year, Rodgers had to complete 70.5 percent of his passes in a career-high season in which he had more than 100 attempts. He was averaging 303.5 passing yards per game, the first time he was averaging over 300 yards per contest since 2011. He had tossed 13 touchdown passes without an interception and had a passer rating of 128.4-flashy number even for the all-time leader in the latter category. That he was doing it without top wide receiver Davante Adams (who had been retired since Week 2 with a hamstring injury) was even more impressive. Rodgers got Adams back in Week 6, and when Green Bay scored on its first two possessions to go up 10-0, it looked like he and Pack went for another huge exit. They don't score another point the rest of the way. For the Packers third series, something happened that wasn't all season long: Rodgers threw an interception. In fact, he threw pick-six to Tampa's Jameel Dean, who put the Buccaneers on the board. Bleacher Report @BleacherReportJameel Dean pick-six for Rodgers 📺 This is Aaron's first INT of the season (via @NFL) Green Bay's next possession, something that happened to be even rarer than Rodgers tossing a pick-six: He threw an interception for the second straight series. That second pick set up a go-ahead touchdown for the Buccaneers, and Tampa never looked back. Things went downhill quickly from there. Facing a ferocious Tampa pass rush that sacked him four times and hit him more than ten times, rattled Rodgers looked as bad as we've seen him. When he was pulled out of the blowout loss, he had completed only 16 of 35 passes for 160 yards. His passer rating was only 35.4. Per ESPN's Rob Demovsky, who had the second worst mark of his career: Rob Demovsky @RobDemovskyTim will be completed by the and Aaron Rodgers will finish with the second lowest passer rating (35.4) in the game that he has started and finished. The only worst was 14 December 2014 in Buffalo (34.3). Rodgers WSA 16-of-35 for 160 yards, no touchdowns ... before the fork is served, no one says Aaron Rodgers is a scrub. Or that he's done. Or that he's not yet a top-10 NFL quarterback. These claims should sail right past the hot take territory. But folks who were willing to call this one of Rodgers' best seasons ever and start chiseling his name for another MVP trophy may have gotten a little carried away. After all, while the Packers won 13 games and the NFC North in 2019, they did so without huge numbers from their quarterback. He threw for more than 50 fewer yards per game in 2019 than he did in four games in 2020, tossed a relatively modest (by his standards) 26 touchdowns and posted his lowest passer rating (95.4) since 2015. Rodgers also benefited from some favorable matchups to start the 2020 campaign. In Week 1, the Packers faced a Minnesota Vikings team that entered Week 6 ranked 27th in pass defense before allowing 371 passing yards and four scores to Atlanta Falcons Matt Ryan. Then came the Detroit Lions team, which is 28th overall defense. Green Bay's Week 3 opponent (New Orleans Saints) only allowed rookie Justin Herbert to throw for 264 yards and four touchdowns. In Week 4, it was a Falcons team that allowed more passing yards per game than every team in the league but one. The killers row it is not, and only one of these teams ranked in the top half of the league bagged a title into this week's action. The Buccaneers had another story coming into the contest for the 16th passing yards allowed and fourth in sacks. It showed. Now, as one might expect, Rodgers was not about to call Sunday's fight anything but a fleeting setback. Jason Wilde @jasonjwildeAaron Rodgers: That is, I believe, an anomaly, not the beginning of the trend. And we have a chance to prove me next week. At least on some level, he's probably right. In Week 7, the Packers head to Houston on a date with the Texans 25th-ranked pass defense. Then comes a rematch with Minnesota's terribly secondary. But there will be matchups with tighter pass defenses and better passing rushes, especially in the postseason. And it's a safe bet that Green Bay opponents will watch the movie for Sunday's game and try to get after Rodgers as the Buccaneers did. Of course, it's no secret how to fight this strategy. The Packers need to get the run game going. Aaron Jones had only 10 carries against Tampa's stout run defense, and after the Packers became one-dimensional, the Bucs were able to pin their ears back. One bad game is nearing the end of the world for either Rodgers or the Packers, who are only half a game back from the NFC North-leading Chicago Bears. As bad as Rodgers looked Sunday, the sky is the most certainly not going. But while we overreact to the bad we saw Sunday, we must also admit that maybe, just maybe, we exaggerate his first four games against mediocre defenses. Rodgers isn't going to have a passer rating of under 40 for the season, but it also won't be north of 125. The truth, as it usually is, lies somewhere between these extremes. Extremes.
